A pale faced man clad only in an undershirt and trousers rushed up to Policeman Maroney at Third avenue and Twentyseventh street shortly before noon yesterday and announced that his wife had been Maroney followed him to a furnished room house at 151 East Twenty-seventh street and found the woman's body lying on the kitchen floor with three bullet wounds in her left breast and one in the WIDOW SUING FOOD EXPERT temple. The man, Edward Hart, said that it was the body of his wife, Annie, who was 28 years old.

After Maroney had sent in a call for de-tectives and an ambulance he got the story from Hart. He said that he was 30 years old and a bartender at Clason's Point. On Wednesday night he did not go to work, he said, but went to bed at 9:30 o'clock. He got up again without awakening his wife and sat in the window smoking until bent over and lifted it up so that a man could climb underneath and pull out the child's body. The doctor from the New York Hospital was called, but all he could do was to say the child had been killed instantly and drive away.

The sight of the girl's body and the temper of the crowd made the motorman leave his car and run for the shelter of a store at 181 Ninth avenue. The crowd was growing larger and angrier every minute when Policeman McGurrik came to Gonder's help. He backed up against the store door behind which Puccarione was shivering and kept the crowd away. Then he and Gonder seized a passing truck and as the reserves from the old West Twentieth street police station came up they put the girl's body and the motorman in the truck and drove to the station house. There the motorman was kept for two hours until the crowd had dwindled, and was then let go.

The burglar started to run, but the women grabbed him. Holding the bundle under one arm he fought with the other hand to escape and dragged the two women out of the building. He headed for a trolley car as soon as he was free. They still held on. After the burglar had dragged them a block a policeman arrested him. The women's clothing was badly torn, their hats were awry and their faces cratched, but they went to the station and saw the burglar locked up. The prisoner said he was Louis Diamond, a tailor, of 179 East 191st street Manhattan.
